B W 801 And 801
The Nautilus 801 is the latest version of B&W's longest-running franchise, the 801 loudspeaker, totally updated with design lessons learned from making the costly, visually striking Nautilus loudspeaker (see the sidebar, "The Inside Story"). The new speaker represents a substantial price increase over the 801 Series III, which retailed for $5500/pair, but B&W is quick to point out that the Nautilus 801 has been so totally redesigned that it would be fairer to compare the 801 Series III to ...

B&W Nautilus 801 loudspeaker | Stereophile.com
The 801 used a 4 th order crossover that was created via a computer-modeling program that employed a design technique that B&W called “numerical optimization.” According to B&W, “by measuring and comparing a working model of the crossover network with the computer model...we were able to achieve a very high order of correspondence between ideal and real-world function.”

Id say the biggest strength of the 801 matrix is the holographic, almost electrostatic sounding midrange, which in some ways is the most important bit to get right. Having got that right B&W had to make big improvements on the bass which they have done with the matix cabinet. Bass notes are clear and tunefull, stop and start right on time.

According to B&W's archive model sight and my general knowledge, I know there is the 801 series 80 (non-Matrix), 801 series 2, and 801 series 3, both Matrix. I'm guessing the 801M must be essential 801 series 1? There really doesn't seem to be any info out there about this model and it is the only Matrix model not listed on their archive site.

B&W 801M vs. 801 Series 2, etc | Audiogon Discussion Forum

The 801's make a violin sound like it's playing on an instrument made of wood (not screechingly metallic or harsh) and at the same time cymbals and triangles sound like they are made of steel (not wooden and lifeless). Voices are throaty and breathy, in short very real sounding. I do not know how B&W managed that, but they did with the 801's.

I owned the B&W 801 Matrix II's for years, then upgraded to the Matrix III's which are far better in the midrange. The II's had a differenct tweeter and had some type of tweeter protector unit that clouded the midrange. The Matrix III's had a new fluid cooled tweeter and new cross over that eliminated that protection circuitry.

B&W marketing discusses the sound from these changes S2 to S3 as cleaner, detailed and warmer. If purchasing these speakers it is important IMO to determine if any lunatic owned them. They may have used them with amplifiers that ended up clipping possibly doing damage to the woofer. This is an easy check.

B&W 801 nautilus VS. B&W 801D (new line) Hey guys, From my understanding, there are two main types of 801s. The 801 nautilus, which is 3-6 years old, and the 801D, which is from the new line that was introduced. My question to you guys are: 1) what is main difference between the two? 2) which one is better? ...

Currently, I have a chance at buying either a pair of B&W M801 series 2, or a pair of B&W M802 series 3. I'm drawn to the 801s over 802s for the better bass extension of the 801 and the fact that it is series 2 which (supposedly?) has better crossover filters and protection circuits.
