Modulation Of Hepatic Acute Phase

CONCLUSIONS: These results show that certain fatty acids have the potential to modulate spontaneous and cytokine-induced alterations in human hepatic acute phase protein metabolism. These data indicate the presence of complex mechanisms of regulation of human hepatic protein metabolism by fatty acids, and further study will be required to establish the nature of their influence in vivo.

Hence, IL-1 β substantially modifies IL-6-induced acute phase protein production as it almost completely abrogates production of acute phase proteins such as γ -fibrinogen, α 2-macroglobulin or α 1-antichymotrypsin, whereas production of for example hepcidin, C-reactive protein and serum amyloid A is strongly up-regulated. This switch-like regulation of IL-6-induced acute phase protein production by IL-1 β is due to a complex processing of the intracellular signaling events activated in ...

Interleukin-6 (IL-6)-type cytokines play important roles in liver (patho-)biology. For instance, they regulate the acute phase response to inflammatory signals and are involved in hepatocarcinogenesis. Much is known about the regulation of protein-coding genes by cytokines whereas their effects on the miRNome is less well understood.

Thus, the modulation of their expression could represent an efficient viral escape mechanism to hamper specific immune cell migration to the liver during the acute phase of the infection. HCV-mediated changes in hepatic immune cell chemotaxis during the chronic phase of the infection are significantly affecting antiviral immunity and tissue damage and thus influence survival of both the host and the virus.
