Chemical product design begins with defining a need for a specific product. This first step in product design can come from one of two stimuli. The most common stimulus, especially in established markets, is the pull of the market where. In this case, a gap is identified in a known market, which a new product could fill.

It emphasizes decisions made before those of chemical process design, a more familiar topic. Chemical product design is a response to major changes in the chemical industry which have occurred in recent decades. These changes, described in Sections 1.2 and 1.3, involve a split in the industry between manufacturers of commodity chemicals and developers of specialty chemicals and other chemical products. The former are best served by process design, and the latter by product design.

In process design we normally begin by knowing what the product is, and how much we want to make. Usually it is a commodity chemical of well defined purity; ethylene and terephthalic acid are good examples. This chemical will be sold into an already existing commodity market. The focus of process design is efficient manufacture.

Chemical Product Design

The new product-oriented chemical industry has three categories of products with different key characteristics. The first and most obvious category is commodities, the same products that used to dominate the chemical enterprise. The key for producing these products is their cost. The second and third categories of products may be less familiar.
