Perioperative Hemodynamic Monitoring And Goal

The fourth section (11 chapters) describes goal-directed haemodynamic optimization in the perioperative setting (including cardiac surgery), intensive care, emergency, and critical care settings. The various methods (fluid therapy, blood transfusion, and vasopressors), monitoring techniques, haemodynamic goals and the evidence for goal-directed therapy, the targets of goal-directed therapy, and the associated controversies are nicely covered in this section.

Perioperative goal-directed haemodynamic therapy (GDT) is a protocolised treatment strategy aimed at optimisation of global cardiovascular dynamics, including oxygen delivery to tissues and organ perfusion pressure. This is achieved by titrating fluids, vasopressors, and inotropes to predefined physiological target values of haemodynamic variables.

The perioperative goal directed therapy (pGDT) was designed to optimize patients' CV performance and thus lower the risk of major complications in the perioperative period. Currently, this approach encompasses number of possible targets and/or treatment algorithms, which has been associated with decreased postoperative complications and improved outcome based on several large meta-analyses (7 - 11).
