VLIW Architecture. Very-Long Instruction Word (VLIW) architectures are a suitable alternative for exploiting instruction-level parallelism (ILP) in programs, that is, for executing more than one basic (primitive) instruction at a time. These processors contain multiple functional units, fetch from the instruction cache a Very-Long Instruction Word containing several primitive instructions, and dispatch the entire VLIW for parallel execution.

In computer architecture, a transport triggered architecture (TTA) is a kind of processor design in which programs directly control the internal transport buses of a processor. Computation happens as a side effect of data transports: writing data into a triggering port of a functional unit triggers the functional unit to start a computation. This is similar to what happens in a systolic array.

WhatIs.com. Very long instruction word (VLIW) describes a computer processing architecture in which a language compiler or pre-processor breaks program instruction down into basic operations that can be performed by the processor in parallel (that is, at the same time). These operations are put into a very long instruction word which the processor can then take apart without further analysis, handing each operation to an appropriate functional unit.
