Since the sensory input from the outside world is at a minimum, the mind uses memory fragments in our brain to create the images, thoughts, and narratives that we commonly call "dreaming." Dreams feel real while they last because the neurons firing in the primary visual cortex create the illusion of seeing things, while neurons firing in the auditory cortex create the illusion of hearing things, and so on.

How the Brain Paints Your Dreams

As teams of investigators develop this theory, some have actually proposed that fragments of a person's memories can be identified in the contents of a person's dreams. In this vein, Professor Sue Llewellyn at the University of Manchester in England has proposed that the act of dreaming serves as a type of memory boosting exercise.
