Recent advances in microscopy have transformed the perception of mitochondria from being static and isolated structures to be dynamic organelles whose configuration varies continuously in the cell. In cells mitochondria modify their morphology from being small individual units (during cell division) to reticular hyperfused network (during cell growth phase).

Mitochondria are highly dynamic organelles which continually fuse and divide in response to diverse stimuli. Participation in the forementioned processes requires a precise regulation at many levels that allows the cell to couple mitochondrial activity to nutrient availability, biosynthetic demands, proliferation rates, and external stimuli.

Mitochondrial

Mitochondria and plastids form dynamic, evolving populations physically embedded in the fluctuating environment of the plant cell. Their evolutionary heritage has shaped how the cell controls the genetic structure and the physical behavior of its organelle populations.
