Garden Architecture in Europe by Torsten Olaf Enge

The typical evolved garden of the period was characterized by some openness of aspect, axial development, a tendency to prolongation, unity of concept between house and garden emphasized by a considerable "built" element of stone, lavish employment of statuary (often in the form of fountains), and the proliferation of such Classical accents as grottoes, nymphaea (Roman buildings with a fountain, plants, and sculpture), urns, and inscriptions. There is no adequate evidence that this type ...
