Skin-mediated softness percepts are produced by the spatial distribution of pressure on the skin. Intensive pressure on a small area results in an experience of the contact with hard object, whereas widely extensive pressure is perceived as that with soft material, as shown in Fig. 3.3. According to the Hertzian contact theory (Johnson 1995), the radius a of a circular contact area made by two spherical bodies, here representing the finger pad and a soft object, is
