Dynamic Pricing of Perishable Assets under Competition

Abstract. We study dynamic price competition in an oligopolistic market with a mix of substitutable and complementary perishable assets. Each firm has a fixed initial stock of items and competes in setting prices to sell them over a finite sales horizon. Customers sequentially arrive at the market, make a purchase choice, and then leave immediately with some likelihood of no purchase.

Abstract. We consider a continuous time dynamic pricing problem for selling a given number of items over a finite or infinite time horizon. The demand is price sensitive and follows a non-homogeneous Poisson process. We formulate this problem as to maximize the expected discounted revenue and obtain the structural properties of the

Chapter 15: Pricing and the Revenue Management

The nature of hotel rooms as a perishable asset is prompting hoteliers to maximize their revenue by trying to achieve optimal dynamic prices using different strategies. Conversely, customers can strategically change their purchase plans in order to pay as little as possible. In this context, heterogeneity among hotels and customers plays a key role.

Dynamic pricing strategies: Evidence from European hotels

We examine three types of dynamic pricing schemes: the dynamic nonuniform pricing (DNP) scheme, the dynamic uniform pricing (DUP) scheme, and the dynamic block pricing (DBP) scheme. For DNP scheme, we have identified a necessary and sufficient condition for the structural properties of optimal policy.
