Results from occupational epidemiology studies have shown increased risk of AA associated with pesticides and benzene exposures [64,65]. The higher incidence among working-age adults suggests that environmental or occupational factors may play a role in the development of AA [65-67]. A large-scale case-control study reported a higher proportion of AA patients exposed to pesticides, solvents, glues, paints, and fuel.

The case-control design is commonly used in occupational epidemiology,¹ and particularly efficient for rare outcomes infrequently observed in cohorts.² Participation rate is an important dimension of study quality in case-control studies, as low participation rates could potentially introduce biases if the participants are systematically different from non-participants.³

Even small biases introduced by differential participation can greatly distort study findings.⁴ Based on simulations ...
