Revolution And Reform In Russia
Reform and reaction in Russia. Russia’s reformist tsar of the 1800s, Alexander II. Tsarism was confronted with several revolutionary groups and reformist movements during its three-century history. The 1800s, in particular, was a period of reform and reaction. A mid-19th century military defeat led to some change in Russia – but the assassination of a tsar in 1881 was followed by a period of brutal reaction.

Russian Populism . The Populists were essentially pre-Marxist socialists and believed that revolution and reform in the Russian empire must come through the peasants, who comprised 80% of the population. The Populists idealized peasants and the ‘Mir’, the Russian agricultural village, and believed that the peasant commune was the perfect basis for a socialist society, allowing Russia to skip Marx's bourgeois and urban stage.

Bolshevik Land Reforms. Land reform was very important to the Bolsheviks. Support from the peasants was needed if the fragile Bolshevik government was going to survive – hence why they agreed that they would hand over control of the land to the peasants in the form of state collective farms. The Provisional Government had failed to do address the land issue and what the Bolsheviks offered to the peasants, while not completely acceptable, was better than having no input on what land could ...
