The Economics of Agricultural Development: An Overview 1

Hence, when a country focuses on making advancements in the agricultural sector, it is, in turn, contributing to its own economic development by starting to address the problems at the root level. Giving significance to the issues at the base level can help to cut down the obstacles in the later stages, and also boost income for an economy.

How Agriculture Contributes to Economic Development

(a) To see that the various inputs which are responsible for pushing agriculture in the second stage of development are progressively utilized by all farmers and also continue to be made available to the farmers at reasonable rates, (this will necessitate a large-scale import for these input from outside through the export of agricultural products and also industrial products after the industrial sector is developed or the setting up of industries producing these inputs in the country itself);

The second major reason for the income differences is that farm people generally have less education than do nonfarm people and are able to earn less at nonfarm jobs. The difference in education is of long standing and is found in all countries, developed and undeveloped; it also exists whether the national education system is highly decentralized, as in the United States, or highly centralized, as in France.
