6 Farming System Approaches ~~ECO Farming: A New Farming System for the 21st Century~~ Resilience Design in Smallholder Farming Systems Training in Mutare, Zimbabwe ~~Rail Farming—high intensity organic farming system~~ From fields to farms and farming systems by Ken Giller

Farming Systems Research has three core characteristics: it builds on systems thinking, it depends on the close collaboration between social and biophysical sciences, and it relies on participation to build co-learning processes. Farming Systems Research posits that to contribute towards sustainable rural development, both interdisciplinary collaborations and local actor engagement are needed.

FARMING SYSTEMS APPROACH Introduction

The term FSR/E in the broadest sense refers to any research and extension that views the farm in a holistic manner and considers interactions in a system (CGIAR, 1978). FSR is an approach to agricultural research and development that views the whole farm as a system and focuses on (i) The interdependencies between the components under the control of members of the household, and (ii) How these components interact with the physical, biological and socioeconomic factors not under the household's ...

New findings suggest that more intensive agriculture might be the "least bad" option for feeding the world while saving its species – provided use of such "land-efficient" systems prevents further conversion of wilderness to farmland. Agriculture that appears to be more eco-friendly but uses more land may actually have greater environmental costs per unit of food than "high-yield" farming that uses less land, a new study has found.

Farming Systems Research and Extension (FSR/E) has strongly influenced the direction of agricultural development over the past two decades. Involving farmers, change agents and researchers, this participatory approach to technological improvement has evolved as an efficient means to develop individual components and more integrated systems that are uniquely suited to specific biophysical and socioeconomic conditions.

"FARMING SYSTEMS RESEARCH/EXTENSION AND THE CONCEPTS OF ...

Farming systems typically include multiple subcomponents with different management requirements, all competing for limited biomass, labor, and cash investments. As most impact studies do not recognize component interactions, they look at isolated system components to analyze potential effects and not at the entire farming system.
