When rock from the mantle melts, moves to the surface through the crust, and releases pent-up gases, volcanoes erupt. Extremely high temperature and pressure cause the rock to melt and become liquid rock or magma. When a large body of magma has formed, it rises through the denser rock layers toward Earth's surface.

How do volcanoes form?

The process of volcanic formation begins as a result of tectonic plate movements on the earth's surface. The tectonic plates are huge rock pieces floating on the surface of the mantle. Because the tectonic plates are floating, they are usually in constant slow motion by either moving towards each other or moving apart.
