Melatonin And The Mammalian Pineal Abstract. The pineal hormone melatonin is secreted with a marked circadian rhythm. Normally, maximum production occurs during the dark phase of the day and the duration of secretion reflects the duration of the night. The changing profile of secretion as a function of daylength conveys photoperiodic information for the organization of seasonal rhythms in mammals.

Traditionally an enigmatic organ, the pineal gland is now understood to contribute significantly to neuroendocrine regulatory mechanisms. Its main mode of action is the secretion of melatonin, which is closely linked to light and dark periods. For the first time, literature on this gland is drawn together into a concise, coherent review.

Rhythmic production of melatonin by the mammalian pineal occurs in response to noradrenergic stimulation which produces a cascade of biochemical events within the pinealocyte. In the rat, massive changes in NAT activity result from an increase in intracellular c-AMP levels produced by a synergistic interaction whereby an $\alpha 1$ activation amplifies β -adrenergic stimulation.
