Artillery And Ammunition Of The Ammunition Projectile, powder, and fuze. In 1850, round solid shot and black powder were standard ammunition for guns, while howitzers fired hollow powder-filled shells ignited by wooden fuzes filled with slow-burning powder. The introduction of rifled ordnance allowed the adoption of elongated projectiles, which, because of their streamlined forms, were much less affected by wind than round balls and, being decidedly heavier than balls of like diameter, ranged much farther.

Artillery - Ammunition | Britannica Artillery shells are ammunition that is designed to be fired from artillery which has an effect over long distances, usually indirectly (i.e., out of sight of the target). There are many different types of artillery ammunition, but they are usually high-explosive and designed to shatter into fragments on impact to maximize damage. The fuze used on an artillery shell can alter how it explodes or behaves so it has a more specialized effect.
