Health Financing For Poor People

Health Financing for Poor People stresses that community financing schemes are no panacea for the problems that low-income countries face in resource mobilization. They should be regarded as a complement to - not as a substitute for - strong government involvement in health care financing and risk management related to the cost of illness.

Health Financing: The Macroeconomic Level.
Financing health care
has evolved from personal payment at the time of service delivery to financing through health insurance (prepayment) by the employer and employee at the workplace. This has progressed in most industrialized countries towards governmental financing through social security or general taxation, supplemented by private and non-governmental organizations (NGOs) (Table 11.3), and personal out-of-pocket expenditures.

For poorer countries, the challenge is to increase the funding available for health so that they are able to provide and make accessible the needed set of health services - treatment, prevention, promotion and rehabilitation - of sufficient quality. For richer countries, the challenge is to protect the current levels of health expenditure while responding to the challenge of an ageing population and cost pressures from technological advances.

Health Financing Profile: Tanzania

December 12, 2019. To mark universal health coverage (UHC) day today, world leaders are being urged to keep the promises they made in a landmark political declaration signed at the United Nations high-level meeting on UHC earlier this year, in September. A key promise is to leave no one behind—to reach poor people and others who are vulnerable first—when trying to ensure that everyone can use quality health services without financial hardship.

We must change how we measure the impact of health ...

This is partly due to poor implementation of health financing policies. People still have to pay out of their pockets for some healthcare, and face numerous other access barriers. What we found
