Adsorption is the transfer of organic substances from a liquid phase onto the surface of a solid phase. Adsorption material should be characterized by a maximum surface area and a minimum volume. The efficiency of adsorption processes depends on the chemical and physical properties of the soluble substances and of the solid surface. A series of materials can be used in the adsorption process: typical adsorption materials include activated carbon, zeolithes, scavengers, activated alumina ...

The physical adsorption of protein onto the surface of an electrode is a simple immobilization method. The adsorption is obtained by volatilizing the buffers containing proteins. The physical adsorption needs no chemical reagent, seldom activation and rinse, so that the bioactivities of the immobilized proteins can be retained well.

When adsorption occurs, the heat of adsorption is exothermic with the positive value of $E_{\text{adsorption}} / \text{h o s t}$; otherwise, for negative value of $E_{\text{adsorption}} / \text{h o s t}$, desorption occurs, and the heat of adsorption is endothermic with the negative value of $E_{\text{adsorption}} / \text{h o s t}$. The adsorption and desorption energy in different shale matrixes and adsorbates has been investigated through calculations using Eq.
