These strategies included how to invite a peer with autism to join a game, how to resolve conflicts, and how to be persistent in the face of rejection. The primary difference between direct instruction and peer modeling is that the PMIs rely on an intermediary (peer models) to facilitate the target social skill rather than working directly with the children with ASD.

Peer Relationships Among Children With ASD: Interventions ...

For many autistic children, play may be different and more difficult to achieve. As parents, our attempts to engage may sometimes falter. However, with understanding and support it should be possible to progress their play, including their 'social play', and for this to support other areas of their development too.

Pretend play happens later in development - usually around two years of age in typically developing children. It's the most sophisticated form of play. Pretend play is particularly important for developing the skills needed for social relationships, language and communication. This type of play is often delayed in children with ASD, but many children with ASD can and do ultimately develop pretend play.
