The Chicago School of literary criticism was a form of criticism of English literature begun at the University of Chicago in the 1930s, which lasted until the 1950s. It was also called Neo-Aristotelianism, due to its strong emphasis on Aristotle's concepts of plot, character and genre. It was partly a reaction to New Criticism, a then highly popular form of literary criticism, which the Chicago critics accused of being too subjective and placing too much importance on irony and figurative ...

Chicago school (literary criticism) - Wikipedia

A couple things that are delicious about cultural studies are that (a) it doesn't have just one theoretical approach, like more traditional forms of literary theory (think: structuralism, New Criticism, etc.), and (b) it doesn't confine itself to one narrow corner of literature or culture. Sure, individual projects may target particular areas, but that's the point.
