722 Words3 Pages. In Book 7 of the Republic, Socrates describes the allegory of the cave, an analogy illustrating a man's transition from inside a cave, where people are prisoners to false realities, to the outside, where the man can see true reality by the light of the sun. Socrates goes on to relate this to the education and duty of the philosopher-kings by arguing that they must return to the cave to share their knowledge with others.

Plato -- Meno/Allegory of the Cave. Plato's Meno is a dialogue between Meno and Socrates. Meno and Socrates are discussing the nature of virtue and Meno questions Socrates, asking him whether or not virtue can be taught, acquired by practice, or whether virtue is acquired in some other way. Socrates believes that virtue is not possible to define and this throws Meno for a loop.

Plato's cave story is an allegory that presents prisoners confined to a place where they are not able to perceive reality. Various aspects of reality faces some form of barring that one would need to overcome to view reality. A good example is the sudden light subjected to a prisoner in order to view real objects other than viewing the shadows.
