Railway junction diagrams, 1915. (1969 edition) | Open Library

The RCH produced Railway Junction Diagrams (RJDs), which show the junctions where two or more railway companies met, and the distances between these junctions and nearby stations and junctions, in order to aid the calculation of mileage-based rates.

Railway Clearing House - Wikipedia

One of the railway junction diagram maps produced by the RCH, in 1914. This one shows the lines around Newcastle-upon-Tyne, including Blaydon, Hexham, and Scotswood. Off to the right is the line to Sunderland, which from 1845 was represented in Parliament by George Hudson MP, one of the leading architects of the Railway Clearing House and a decidedly colourful figure.

The Railway Clearing House (RCH) was set up in 1842, initially to apportion receipts for goods and passengers passing between individual railway companies. The RCH naturally provided a forum in which the companies could discuss joint operations. One particular difficulty was the interworking of wagons for which there were no accepted standards.
