In digital communications, a turbo equalizer is a type of receiver used to receive a message corrupted by a communication channel with intersymbol interference. It approaches the performance of a maximum a posteriori receiver via iterative message passing between a soft-in soft-out equalizer and a SISO decoder. It is related to turbo codes in that a turbo equalizer may be considered a type of iterative decoder if the channel is viewed as a non-redundant convolutional code. The turbo equalizer is

Introduction to Turbo Coding and Turbo Detection

In information theory, turbo codes are a class of high-performance forward error correction codes developed around 1990–91, but first published in 1993. They were the first practical codes to closely approach the maximum channel capacity or Shannon limit, a theoretical maximum for the code rate at which reliable communication is still possible given a specific noise level. Turbo codes are used in 3G/4G mobile communications and in satellite communications as well as other applications ...
