In Terri Windling's introduction to Charles de Lint's new short story collection, Waifs & Strays, she draws attention to de Lint's work as "a celebration of the creative process," this time more strongly aimed toward a young adult audience. Yet in the author's note, de Lint is quick to point out that these stories are not stories written for young adults, but rather stories written about young adults.

De Lint's (Onion Girl, 2001, etc.) pen is ever graceful and evocative, his heroines simultaneously earthy and evanescent. Like the young artist of "Somewhere in My Mind There is a Painting Box," most of them learn to tread the delicate balance between "fairies and fancies" and "the everyday magic all around."
