Child Abuse Trauma: Theory and Treatment of the Lasting ...

Children suffering from trauma commonly experience repetitive memories and behaviors, trauma-specific fears, and changed attitudes about people, life, and the future. Child abuse is especially destructive when perpetrated by the parent, as it reflects a devastating corruption of the parent-child relationship. The child may experience an “accommodation syndrome” in which they may eventually attempt to normalize their experience of abuse.

Understanding Psychodynamics of Child Abuse and Trauma

If parents maltreat their children over an extended period, therefore, the theory predicts that such children may absorb these parents’ negative behaviours into their own behavioural patterns and, later in life, when they themselves become parents, replicate/'play out' such behavioural patterns within their own families (this is sometimes known as intergenerational transmission [of the effects of trauma]).
