In the real world, intelligence analysts use data from diverse sources. They frequently make nonnumerical forecasts that are vague and hard to score for accuracy, so feedback is often absent. Intelligence analysts shift their response thresholds depending on the cost of the errors. That is, they are likelier to say “signal” when the costs of a miss are high, and they are likelier to say “noise” when the costs of a false alarm are high.

Intelligence analysis is fundamentally a mental process, but understanding this process is hindered by the lack of conscious awareness of the workings of our own minds. A basic finding of cognitive psychology is that people have no conscious experience of most of what happens in the human mind.

Chapter 1 — Central Intelligence Agency

The process of analysis itself reinforces this natural function of the human brain. Analysis usually involves creating models, even though they may not be labeled as such. We set forth certain understandings and expectations about cause-and-effect relationships and then process and interpret information through these models or filters.
