An extensive area (2200 km²) of recently collected multibeam bathymetry data, combined with seismic reflection profiles reveal this part of the shelf to have been extensively modified by both glacial and modern processes. Our new geomorphological evidence strongly supports the contention that an ice stream drained ice from western Scotland and the Inner Hebrides towards the Barra Fan at the continental shelf break at the height of the last glaciation (Marine Isotope Stage 2-3).

Glacier morphology, or the form a glacier takes, is influenced by temperature, precipitation, topography, and other factors. The goal of glacial morphology is to gain a better understanding of glaciated landscapes, and the way they are shaped. Types of glaciers can range from massive ice sheets, such as the Greenland ice sheet, to small cirque glaciers found perched on mountain tops. Glaciers can be grouped into two main categories: Ice flow is constrained by the underlying bedrock topography

Glacier morphology - Wikipedia

Glacial geomorphology is concerned principally with the role of glacial ice in landform and landscape evolution while periglacial geomorphology is fundamentally concerned with the development of landscapes in cold, nonglacial environments. Unlike the obviously profound impact glacial ice has on landscape evolution, periglacial conditions are often viewed as acting to modify landscapes in cold climates and not to form distinctive landscapes in their own right.

They are erosional forces because their ice carves the ground beneath them and on the sides, which forms a U-shaped valley, as with a valley glacier. Glaciers are also depositional because their movement pushes rocks and other debris into new areas. The sediment created when glaciers grind down rocks is called glacial rock flour. As glaciers melt, they drop debris, which creates features like eskers and moraines.
