Abstract. The legal and political difficulties of managing fish stocks that straddle both national waters and the high seas were not abolished by the introduction of exclusive economic zones. Here, chapters explain the wave of bitter disputes that arose in the 1990s over such straddling stocks. They show how regional responses to those challenges shaped the negotiation of a 1995 UN Fish Stocks Agreement and helped strengthen the global high seas fisheries regime.

It's no secret that the world's fisheries are in trouble. In response, a radical idea is under serious consideration: a complete ban on fishing in international waters, also called the high seas. The idea is bold, but not completely far-fetched. Only a few nations do most of the fishing, and large international marine reserves already exist.

Outside of these concerns, the high seas are a fishing free-for all. In early 2015, United Nations member states agreed the High Seas need protection, and they are now hammering out an international treaty to protect the High Seas. There is even talk of closing certain biologically important areas of the open ocean entirely, or creating marine protected areas where fishing and other activity may be limited or regulated if not completely banned. The “White Shark Café” in the Pacific ...

The findings show that it is possible to apply Ostrom’s (1990) design principles to uncover how RFMOs can be designed for higher performance in governing high seas fisheries. However, adjusted and additional design principles are necessary to have a better understanding of the factors that contribute to sustainable high seas fisheries.
