A cluster of interrelated plasma lipid and lipoprotein abnormalities associated with alterations in VLDL metabolism contribute to the risk for atherosclerosis and CHD in the majority of patients with type 2 diabetes. Insulin resistance plays a key role in the development of diabetic dyslipidemia.

Cholesterol and triglycerides are the major lipids in humans and are transported in plasma by lipoproteins. A lipoprotein is composed of cholesterol, triglycerides, and a single apolipoprotein B 100 molecule (apoB) when secreted into plasma by the liver, and is referred to as a very low-density lipoprotein (VLDL). The triglycerides are rapidly removed by the enzyme lipoprotein lipase and used for energy consumption and storage.
