This model is an integrated agricultural system of raising vegetables in which both vegetable byproducts and land unsuitable for other agricultural purposes are used to produce meat, dairy, and other animal products., "Simon Fairlie provides us with an unusual and extremely important gift in his new book, Meat: A Benign Extravagance.

Meat : A Benign Extravagance by Simon Fairlie (2010, Trade ...

Fairlie shows us that meat production in essence is a secondary function of holistic farming: a gift of land, and is at the very worst, a "benign extravagance". While Fairlie tackles the most inflated arguments against meat production, his strongest critique is reserved for industrial agriculture, which leverages the use of petroleum to produce a kind of meat that is by any measure non-sustainable.

Meat: A Benign Extravagance may only bruise veganism, but it's a bruise that will not soon heal. His fair treatment of veganism has more to do with intellectual honesty than admiration; it would be wrong to say that Fairlie regards the vegan ethic as positive, harmless or irrelevant. If he thought that, he wouldn't have engaged it so much.
