The writers and editors of this Bible commentary assume the point of view that the text of the Bible is largely the inspired word of God, but not always a literal history of events. In particular, much of Genesis is considered legendary in nature. It is suggested, for example, that many of the descendents of Noah's errant son Ham fall somewhat too conveniently under the aegis of Israel's traditional enemies--especially Ham's son Canaan, who Noah oddly sees fit to curse by name.
